My Family Time

They speak of times when domestic felicitous meant a drive to hamburger bar, going picnic ing in parks, throwing ball in the yard, or visiting the cinema. Yet at times have altered and developed like glaciers under influence of climate change, so have ^{the} varieties of ways people spend family time bloomed and multiplied in range. There are modern times, and while a majority of households may have kept the term 'family time' alive, it is ever wadding and deeply striking that numerous families have lost this fundamental necessity for the prevail of a happily contented household withier and etc.

Despite the busy schedules, working till nine and the never ending ^{study} cycle of 'exercise-sleep-rest', my family has not yet failed to keep our 'family time' alive. Though my parents' schedules seem constantly replete with jobs to do ^{and} errands to run, with little close to no more time for family fun, the two remaining days ^{of a week} are moments where we most often retain empty schedules and wrap off to enjoy our time together under the sun. Sometimes it's a trip to our grandparents', other's it's a day at the park ^{or} shopping mart, but most often times we merely stay in, play cards, eat torts, and howl when someone forts.

Our family time wouldn't be considered anything near perfect, yet it's those imperfections and unique parts that seem each and every second of them worth it. Other families may spend their time together at costly restaurants and expensive venues, yet I find that the bonding of a family need not require pricey menus. It's about spending time with each other, catching up, listening, sharing, laughing, and crying. It's about yielding in time for one another, sharing each other's thoughts, and showing that you care without losing interest and acting more intent towards your phone. A family is a haven of safety, love, guidance, and refuge. To be a family member implies a marriage of both loving and adoration for one's family, and a certain sense of attentiveness as regards that which concerns the household. Busy schedules may serve boundaries to family members spending time together, yet we must never forget that no amount of duties or studies should lead us astray from fulfilling our duty of creating memories with our family of which lasts forever.

(more space in the back)

Family Time is spent differently within each household, but one thing they all share is the notion of bringing each family member closer together. No matter one be old and bold, or young with wrabbling knees, we must never cease to remember the love and care we share with our families.

Let us spend our family time wisely, treat each other nicely, not were with something pricey, but so that the bond we share may bloom and flourish, leafy, greenly, and knely.
