In our country, people are used to working constantly and seldom taking a rest for a while. Take students in Taiwan for instance, after school, they usually head for cram school directly or take another talent courses. That is to say, they scarcely have their time to do the things which they're truly interested in. In this way, studying seems to be the only thing that they really concern.

I think the working philosophy of Taiwanese is abnormal. According to my observation, people always work so hard that sometimes they don't even realize what they are persisting for. In my opinion, some people just keep dashing on an endless road and never know where the destination is. In the end, they probably acquire nothing and feel exhausted.

As a saying goes, "All works and no play makes Jack a dull boy." The tedious life should be seasoned by some fun. In addition, relaxing can help people regain their energy and keep a clear thinking.

Mentioned in some scientific studies, exercising is also a good way to improve one's physical and mental condition. So, working hard all day long without taking a rest isn't advisable for everyone.

Furthermore, working hard all the time lacks of efficiency. People should use time wisely instead of spending too much time on one thing. In the other hand, I think "quality" is more important than "quantity".

(more space in the back)

working hard doesn't always mean doing well. Finding an effective way is the key to success.

Speaking of cultivating the habits, those who work too hard often overlook of it. Finding your habits is not just for fun but also makes your life meaningful. For example, some people turn the skills and knowledge acquired from the school clubs into a lifetime career. To be honestly, combining both of them sounds wonderful.

There are a lot of things in the world which are more important than working and studying. Why not leave your comfort zone and give them a try to broaden your horizon and lead a colorful life?
